Thanks to our investments in advanced technology, we'll bring dramatic changes to the wireless and residential broadband markets. So the next logical step in this process is to transform ourselves around the evolving needs of the enterprise market. This, of course, is the purpose of our acquisition of MCI.

Now, I'm sure you understand that this is a very fluid situation. So I can't comment too extensively on where we stand in this process. But let me reiterate our belief that the combination of Verizon and MCI will create a national, full-service company with the financial strength and technology resources to deliver the broadband, multimedia world of tomorrow to our customers.

That's because one of MCI's core strengths is its network assets, which includes leading IP-based technologies. By bringing our two companies together, we'll create a company with the advanced products, network reach and capital capacity required to invest and compete in this technology-intensive and highly competitive market.

Our Enterprise customers will benefit because we'll create a strong, stable and secure strategic partner for national and global businesses as they prepare for the broadband future. Our residential customers will benefit because MCI's IP network and products - combined with Verizon's deployment of fiber directly to homes and business - will be the most advanced broadband platform in the country, capable of delivering next-generation multimedia services in markets across the U.S.

And the U.S. economy will benefit because we're creating a strong, U.S.-based company capable of investing in the new technologies so critical to job creation and leadership in the global marketplace.
