Transition teams focus on the future, while Trigon continues to make strides today

While most of us continue to focus on serving members and providers, a sizeable group of Trigon employees and Anthem associates dove right into planning the merger of these two high-performing companies.

It's a huge undertaking.

From business cards to medical policy to information systems, there are thousands of decisions and recommendations to make, and they typically are being made among people who didn't even know each other until a few weeks ago.

Many Trigon transition team members have made the trip to Anthem headquarters in Indianapolis and other Anthem plans. A number of Anthem associates also have made the trip to Trigon headquarters in Richmond.

Fifteen transition teams with co-leaders from each company hold weekly meetings to develop transition plans for their areas of both companies. Dozens of subteams are in daily contact to help develop the same plans. In addition, the Executive Steering Committee meets weekly with various transition team leaders as they identify best practices in order to develop and recommend plans to bring the two organizations together. Roughly 80 people from both Anthem and Trigon are involved in transition planning; meaning more than 160 people in at least two different time zones are synching up calendars and scheduling phone conferences to keep transition planning on track.

That's a lot of impressive work. Just as impressive is that a number of Trigon's key customer service metrics have never been higher despite transition activities.

For example, Service Operations is answering phone calls from customers and providers substantially faster than the same time last year. Trigon continues to receive more than 2 million claims every month. Through continued focus on automation, processing is being completed faster than last year while maintaining a financial accuracy rate of between 98 and 99 percent. These and other consistently strong service results have helped produce impressive levels of customer satisfaction.

Please congratulate our partners at Trigon for staying focused on today while planning for tomorrow.

Transition team update - Information Technology team identifies cost savings

As the Anthem-Trigon transition teams move forward investigating opportunities for cost-savings and efficiencies, one area that shows promise is information technology vendor procurement. By leveraging Anthem's size and negotiated pricing, early results indicate that Trigon may be able to save on most IT vendor contracts and PC purchases. The teams are working with vendors to begin realizing these savings as soon as possible, while also investigating other ways for Trigon to leverage Anthem's buying power.

The information technology team and the other transition teams continue to identify ways best practices can result in additional savings. The Transition Update will keep you informed about this process.

What Trigon's hearing from its members

Trigon opened a toll-free number shortly after the merger was announced and included the phone number in a mailing to members introducing the merger. Since early May, Trigon has received fewer than 500 calls from members. Trigon serves 2.2 million members in Virginia.

The first few days after the merger, the phone line was staffed by about half a dozen employees from throughout the company who took turns fielding approximately 100 merger-related calls a week. That number has slowed to about 25 a week now, according to Liz Perry, director of executive inquiry and corporate appeals at Trigon. Perry and others in her department are now answering caller questions.

Members mostly want to know if things are going to change, and we tell them they won't notice any change and we'll still be here in Virginia to serve Virginians, Perry said.
